Glenbow is more than a museum; it is a place of confluence where stories, objects, and people meet. Once an inward-looking concrete vault, it is now transformed into a permeable, luminous space that connects art with community and the city beyond.

The new architecture blurs boundaries between inside and out, institution and city, what a museum has been and what it might become. For the first time, Glenbow will have front doors carved directly into its façades along Stephen Avenue and 9th Avenue. Inside, the vertical gallery, a soaring five-storey atrium, draws daylight deep into the building, creating a space for orientation and contemplation. Conservation labs, art storage, and workshops are revealed, making visible the care and craft behind the collections. Galleries flex and adapt; quiet moments coexist with soaring public spaces. The Salon gallery introduces the "pillow window" to city views, reinforcing a porous, transparent experience that acts both as mirror and window – inviting reflection while opening outward.

Glenbow's design embraces a deliberate "fuzziness," creating a building that is open to interpretation and change. Its diaphanous skin of glass-fibre-reinforced concrete shifts with the light, dissolving at its edges – never singular, always changing with time, season, and perception.

This act of reimagining is also one of stewardship. By embracing adaptive reuse, the project preserves 38,000 tons of concrete from landfill and avoids generating 56,000 tons of new carbon. The transformation of 354,000 square feet in the heart of Calgary's cultural district is as much a civic gesture as it is an architectural one. A museum for everyone, a vessel not only for art but for belonging.
